

defendant's motion plainly fails, due to failure to meet and confer and failure to provide the Separate Statement in support of the motion. (At one point, defendant's memorandum asserts that a Separate Statement was filed, but none appears in the court records.) In Sinaiko Healthcare Consulting, supra, 148 Cal.App.4th 390, 403-404, the Court held that providing partial responses after the motion to compel had been filed did not create an exception from the statutory waiver of objections.

Applying the statute literally, the responses were not timely, and the method to obtain relief from the waiver was to file a motion with the court seeking relief from the waiver. Plaintiff acknowledges that it has not done so. Accordingly, the motion must be granted. The court may order, however, only that responses without objection be provided and does not address any other alleged infirmities in the responses. Plaintiff is to file the responses within 30 days.

Defendant requests sanctions of $2,160, based on a $600 hourly rate, and including $900 for time spent on preparing the motion and the remaining $1,260 for preparation of a reply and appearance at the hearing.

Sanctions are mandatory unless the party subject to the sanction "acted with substantial justification or [where] other circumstances make the imposition of the sanction unjust." (Sections 2020.300 (d), 2032.310(h).) Given the timing of the response and the failure of defense counsel to make any effort to resolve the issues, assuming they have any, the Court finds that plaintiff "acted with substantial justification" and that "other circumstances make the imposition of the sanction unjust."

Thus the Court grants the motion in part, and plaintiff shall provide responses without objection within 30 days of notice of entry of this order. Sanctions are denied.

HEARING ON MOTION IN RE: MOTION TO QUASH SERVICE OF SUMMONS FOR LACK OF PERSONAL JURISDICTION FILED BY DEF ON 04/07/2026

FILED BY:

TENTATIVE RULING:

I. Introduction

This matter comes before the Court on Defendants' Motion to Quash Service of Summons for Lack of Personal Jurisdiction, which was filed on April 7, 2026. Plaintiff Dariush Zandi commenced the underlying action by filing a Complaint on January 28, 2026.

The briefing regarding the Motion to Quash is complete. On July 1, 2026, Plaintiff filed an Opposition to the motion, supported by declarations from Dariush Zandi, Steven Nemec, and Frank Kaul. On July 14, 2026, Defendants filed a Reply in support of their motion, as well as the supporting declaration of Sina Pirooz and an Objection to Plaintiff's declarations.

All parties have been timely notified of the filings and the subsequent hearing on this matter. Having reviewed the pleadings, the supporting declarations, and the arguments presented, the Court finds that it has personal jurisdiction over all Defendants named in this case.

Thus, Defendants' motion is DENIED.

II. Background

This dispute arises from allegations that Defendants overcharged Plaintiff by $20,000 for a purchase Plaintiff made from Defendants' pharmacy. Plaintiff alleges breach of contract and fraud. Plaintiff claims that he negotiated the transaction via phone calls and text messages while he was in California. Defendants counter that the transaction took place entirely on-premises at Defendants' pharmacy in Vancouver, Canada. Plaintiff claims to have communicated with Defendant Pirooz about the transaction, and further alleges that, after the transaction, Defendants refused his request for a refund while he was in California.

Defendants support their contentions with Defendant Sina Pirooz's signed declaration, which states that Pirooz and his pharmacy, 0919169 B.C. Ltd. dba Coal Harbour Pharmacy ("Coal Harbour"), are not registered to do business in California, do not do business in or with California, do not have any present intention of ever doing so, and have no physical or professional presence in California. Pirooz's declaration does not deny that he communicated with Plaintiff by phone and text message while Plaintiff was in California; it denies only that the disputed transaction was part of those communications. Defendants' court papers have been filed by their California counsel.

Plaintiff supports his contentions with three signed declarations. The first declaration details his own account of the transaction, which he alleges took place in part through phone calls and text messages he conducted in California; Plaintiff implicitly acknowledges that he did not place an order through Coal Harbour's website.

The other two declarations were filed by private investigators, and they detail Coal Harbour's website and the investigators' experience ordering supplements from it.¹ The investigators' declarations, supported by photographic exhibits, describe a purchase billed and shipped to Santa Clara, California, and delivered by ordinary mail without requiring any special arrangements. The package's return address named Pirooz individually, and the packing slip enclosed within named Coal Harbour Pharmacy. The investigators' declarations further document Coal Harbour's online storefront, which operates on the Shopify platform and stocks goods independently of the physical pharmacy. They also document Coal Harbour’s FAQs and shipping documentation, which reflect a regular practice of selling and shipping to customers throughout the United States.

Defendants’ core argument here is that specific jurisdiction cannot exist for three reasons: First, Defendants do not purposefully avail themselves of California as a forum because they do the vast majority of their business in Canada and do not seek to serve the California market. Second, if Defendants did purposefully avail themselves of California’s market, there would still not be specific jurisdiction here because this dispute arose from a transaction that took place entirely in Canada. Finally, even if Defendants did have minimum contacts with California, it would be an undue burden on Defendants to appear in court in California, and thus unreasonable.

Defendants also object to three paragraphs in the Zandi Declaration on the grounds of Evidence Code sections 1200 (hearsay) and 1523, subdivision (a) (oral evidence to prove content of writing).

Plaintiff conversely relies on Defendants’ alleged facilitation of internet-based sales to California to establish purposeful availment, and he claims that the transaction occurred at least in part in California, tying this dispute to his requested forum. He argues that jurisdiction is reasonable because modern technology minimizes Defendants’ marginal costs of litigating in California instead of Canada, and because most of the evidence relevant to this dispute is digital.

Plaintiff argues in the alternative that the court should allow pretrial discovery to investigate Defendants’ actual level of sales into California if specific jurisdiction does not exist on the evidence presented thus far.

III. Analysis

A. Legal Standards

California courts “may exercise jurisdiction on any basis not inconsistent with the Constitution of this state or of the United States.” (Code Civ. Proc., § 410.10.) Practically, this means the U.S. Supreme Court sets the effective limits on California courts’ personal jurisdiction. (Vons Companies, Inc. v. Seabest Foods, Inc. (1996) 14 Cal.4th 434, 444–445 (Vons).)

Personal jurisdiction exists either as “general (sometimes called all-purpose) jurisdiction [or] specific (sometimes called case-linked) jurisdiction.” (Ford Motor Co. v. Mont. Eighth Judicial Dist. Court (2021) 592 U.S. 351, 358 (Ford).) The parties here only invoke specific jurisdiction, which is analyzed under a three-pronged inquiry:

When determining whether specific jurisdiction exists, courts consider the relationship among the defendant, the forum, and the litigation. A court may exercise specific jurisdiction over a nonresident defendant only if: (1) the defendant has purposefully availed himself or herself of forum benefits; (2) the controversy is related to or arises out of [the] defendant's contacts with the forum; and (3) the assertion of personal jurisdiction would comport with fair play and substantial justice.

When a defendant moves to quash service of process for lack of specific jurisdiction, the plaintiff has the initial burden of demonstrating facts justifying the exercise of jurisdiction. If the plaintiff meets this initial burden, then the defendant has the burden of demonstrating that the exercise of jurisdiction would be unreasonable.

(Snowney v. Harrah's Entertainment, Inc. (2005) 35 Cal.4th 1054, 1062 (Snowney) (quotation marks and citations omitted for clarity).)

While lower federal courts do not bind California courts, "they are persuasive and entitled to great weight." (Etcheverry v. Tri-Ag Service, Inc. (2000) 22 Cal.4th 316, 320.) California courts often rely on lower federal court precedent in analyzing personal jurisdiction. (E.g., Snowney, supra, 35 Cal.4th at p. 1064–1065; Pavlovich v. Superior Court (2002) 29 Cal.4th 262, 269–270 (Pavlovich).)

1. Purposeful Availment

The purposeful availment inquiry "focuses on the defendant's intentionality" and ensures constitutional Due Process by preventing "jurisdiction solely as a result of 'random,' 'fortuitous,' or 'attenuated' contacts." (Pavlovich, supra, 29 Cal.4th at p. 269.) When a defendant interacts with a forum state intentionally, then "it has clear notice that it is subject to suit there." (Ibid.) The internet does not change the inquiry: defendants purposefully avail themselves of California as a forum if they "purposefully derive[] a benefit from their Internet activities in California." (Snowney, supra, 35 Cal.4th at pp. 1064–1065.)

This analysis is "not rigid and formalistic, but rather practical and pragmatic." (Boschetto v. Hansing (9th Cir. 2008) 539 F.3d 1011, 1016 (Boschetto).) "The formation of a contract with a nonresident defendant is not, standing alone, sufficient to create jurisdiction." (Id. at p. 1017.) However, when "a defendant, in its regular course of business, sells a physical product via an interactive website and causes that product to be delivered to the forum, the defendant 'expressly aimed' its conduct at that forum." (Herbal Brands, Inc. v. Photoplaza, Inc. (9th Cir. 2023) 72 F.4th 1085, 1093 (Herbal Brands).) If a defendant "direct[s] its activities toward all 50 states," then each state properly has jurisdiction over it. (Briskin v. Shopify, Inc. (9th Cir. 2025) 135 F.4th 739, 758 (en banc).)

2. Relatedness

Relatedness is satisfied if "there is a substantial nexus or connection between the defendant's forum activities and the plaintiff's claim." (Jayone Foods, Inc. v. Aekyung Industrial Co. Ltd. (2019) 31 Cal.App.5th 543, 560 (Jayone Foods).) That connection need not be causal. (Ford, supra, 592 U.S. at p. 362.) When a defendant cultivates a particular kind of business in California, Californian plaintiffs' claims are "related" if they were harmed by the kind of business that the defendant cultivated. (Daimler Trucks North America LLC v. Superior Court (2022) 80 Cal.App.5th 946, 958 (Daimler).)

3. Reasonableness

To determine whether jurisdiction would be unreasonable, the court must consider the burden on the defendant, the interests of the forum State, and the plaintiff's interest in obtaining relief. It must also weigh in its determination the interstate judicial system's interest in obtaining the most efficient resolution of controversies; and the shared interest of the several States in furthering fundamental substantive social policies. Where ... a defendant who purposefully has directed its activities at forum residents seeks to defeat jurisdiction, it must present a compelling case that the presence of some other considerations would render jurisdiction unreasonable.

(Snowney, supra, 35 Cal.4th at p. 1070, quotation marks and citations omitted for clarity.) “[T]alismanic jurisdictional formulas” do not exist for this inquiry; instead, “the facts of each case must [always] be weighed’ in determining whether personal jurisdiction would comport with ‘fair play and substantial justice.’” (Burger King Corp. v. Rudzewicz (1985) 471 U.S. 462, 485–486, quoting Kulko v. California Superior Court (1978) 436 U.S. 84, 92.)

A defendant's inconvenience, on its own, does not defeat jurisdiction “unless the inconvenience is so great as to constitute a deprivation of due process ... the same technological progress in communication and transportation that has increased the flow of commerce between the states and the need for jurisdiction over nonresidents, has simultaneously decreased the burdens inherent in defending a lawsuit in a foreign tribunal.” (Integral Development Corp. v. Weissenbach (2002) 99 Cal.App.4th 576, 592 (cleaned up) (Integral Development).)

B. Discussion

The court finds that it has personal jurisdiction over both Defendants with respect to both of Plaintiff's claims.

First, Plaintiff has proven that both Pirooz and Coal Harbour purposefully availed themselves of California as a forum. Second, Plaintiff has proven that both claims here are related to Defendants' purposeful contacts with California. Finally, Defendants have not made a compelling case that jurisdiction here is unreasonable.

1. Plaintiff has shown that Defendants purposefully availed themselves of California as a forum by facilitating sales to California in the regular course of their e-commerce business.

Two cases help illustrate how Defendants purposefully availed themselves of California as a forum:

In Boschetto, supra, the Ninth Circuit found purposeful availment lacking when a

Wisconsin man used eBay to facilitate the sale of a “lone transaction for the sale of one item” to a Californian buyer. (539 F.3d at p. 1017) The sale was not purposeful availment because it created no sustained connection between the defendant and California. (Ibid.) Instead, “the eBay listing was not part of broader e-commerce activity; the listing temporarily advertised a good for sale and that listing closed once the item was sold, thereby extinguishing the Internet contact for this transaction within the forum state.” (Id. at p. 1018.) With respect to “‘random,’ ‘fortuitous,’ or ‘attenuated’” contacts, the sale might have been “random” or “fortuitous” because of car sales’ typically local nature, and it was “attenuated” because it constituted the entirety of the defendant’s business in California. (Pavlovich, supra, 29 Cal.4th at p. 269.)

Conversely, in Herbal Brands, supra, the same court ruled that out-of-state defendants who had used Amazon to sell Herbal Brands’s products into Arizona had purposefully availed themselves of Arizona as a forum state. (72 F.4th at p. 1088.) The defendants had control over whether their products arrived in Arizona because they intentionally served all 50 states, choosing not to exclude Arizona. (Id. at p. 1094–1095.) The court explained that even a single sale and shipment to a forum state can establish purposeful availment so long as it was not “a truly isolated sale.” (Id. at p. 1095.) Though not contested, the court held that a sale into a forum would be purposeful availment if it occurred within “a defendant’s regular course of business,” itself a “case-specific question that turns on many factors.” (Id. at pp. 1094, 1095.) In other words, a single e-commerce sale to a forum state cannot be “‘random,’ ‘fortuitous,’ or ‘attenuated’” if it occurs in a defendant’s regular course of business.

Here, Plaintiff has shown that Coal Harbour’s website mediates actual sales and shipments into California, “purposefully deriv[ing] a benefit from [its] Internet activities” here in its regular course of business. (Snowney, supra, 35 Cal.4th at p. 1063.) Like the sellers in Herbal Brands, Coal Harbour uses an e-commerce storefront to intentionally facilitate sales to a forum state (there, Arizona; here, California); while Coal Harbour could have chosen not to ship its products here, it did. (See Herbal Brands, supra, 72 F.4th at p. 1094–1095; Nemec Decl. Ex. 2 pp. 2, 12, Ex. 4 pp. 2, 4.) Both Amazon, used in Herbal Brands, and Shopify, used by Coal Harbour, are third-party sales and fulfillment services, but in neither case does third-party presence defeat the ultimate control defendants exercise over their targeting of different forums. (See Herbal Brands, supra, 72 F.4th at p. 1088; Pirooz Decl. ¶ 10; Nemec Decl. ¶¶ 3–7.)

Plaintiff has also shown that Coal Harbour’s California sales are not random, fortuitous, or attenuated. Coal Harbour’s website precludes the possibility of random or fortuitous sales—it chose to ship supplements only to certain markets, successfully excluding most of the planet. (Nemec Decl. Ex. 4 pp. 2–4.) Defendants’ actual argument is that Coal Harbour does no “business in or with California,” which suggests attenuated contacts, not random or fortuitous ones. (Pirooz Decl. ¶ 6.) But comparing Boschetto with Herbal Brands makes clear why that argument is incorrect. Coal Harbour operates an online store that stocks goods independently of its physical location. (Nemec Decl. Ex. 2 p. 3.) Its multiple FAQs and extensive shipping documentation demonstrate that its regular course of business includes repeated online sales to the U.S. (Nemec Decl. Ex. 2 p. 3, Ex. 4 pp. 2–3.) Coal Harbour is, in fact, engaged in the type of “broader e-commerce activity” that the court in Boschetto held was absent there. (Boschetto, supra, 539 F.3d at p. 1018.) The fact that Plaintiff’s private investigators were able to have Coal Harbour ship them supplements using an ordinary online order corroborates that Coal Harbour’s “regular course of business” includes sales into California. (Herbal Brands, supra, 72 F.4th at p. 1094.)

Pirooz’s personal purposeful availing of California’s market is even more direct than Coal Harbour’s. Even if he physically sold Plaintiff goods in Canada, Pirooz does not contest that he communicated via phone calls and text messages with Plaintiff while Plaintiff was located in California, and no evidence suggests he made any effort to avoid serving California (for example, by screening phone customers). (Zandi Decl. ¶ 9; Pirooz Decl. ¶¶ 9–11.) Further, the package that Plaintiff’s investigators received listed Pirooz as the return addressee, not Coal Harbour or another employee, implying that Pirooz is personally involved with administering Coal Harbour’s e-commerce. (Nemec Decl. Ex. 1.) These actions indicate that Pirooz knowingly and purposefully facilitated sales to customers he knew or should have known were in California, demonstrating his own purposeful availing. Because his personal contacts demonstrate purposeful availing, there is no need at this stage to engage in any corporate-veil analysis to determine whether Coal Harbour’s contacts are also Pirooz’s.

2. Plaintiff has shown that this dispute is related to the Defendants’ forum contacts because the dispute concerns a sale of the same type as Defendants’ regular business with California.

To establish specific jurisdiction, Plaintiff must further prove that his claims share a “substantial nexus or connection” with Defendants’ forum activities that constitute purposeful availing. (Jayone Foods, supra, 31 Cal.App.5th 543, 560.)

In Daimler, supra, the court found that a Californian plaintiff’s suit over an out-of-state accident while driving a Daimler truck was sufficiently related to Daimler’s purposeful contacts with California to establish relatedness. (80 Cal.App.5th 946, 950.) Daimler argued two points: first, that it “did not design, manufacture, assemble, or sell the subject vehicle in California,” and second, that “the injuries and accident occurred in Oklahoma.” (Id. at p. 957.) The Court of Appeals rejected both arguments, citing Ford, supra, 592 U.S. 351. (Daimler, supra, 80 Cal.App.5th at p. 950.) It explained that the truck itself need not have any connection with California; relatedness was satisfied because (1) Daimler built a market for the same type of truck to be sold in California and (2) the Californian plaintiff was using the truck for Daimler’s intended purpose. (Ibid.) Regarding the location of the injuries, the court explained that “the place of injury ... may be relevant” to relatedness, but is not a prerequisite. (Ibid.) Instead, it held that the plaintiff’s residence in California, past use of the truck in California, and medical bills incurred in California demonstrated relatedness enough to overcome the accident’s out-of-state location. (Ibid.) The court distinguished the case from the Supreme Court’s extreme example of no relatedness presented in Ford: “a California court hearing a claim ... brought by an Ohio plaintiff based on an accident occurring in Ohio involving a car purchased in Ohio.” (Daimler, supra, 80 Cal.App.5th at p. 950, quoting Ford, supra, 592 U.S. at p. 362 fn. 3.)

Here, Plaintiff’s claims of breach and fraud are both related to Coal Harbour’s targeting of the California market. Though Plaintiff did not order anything from Coal Harbour’s website, (Zandi Decl. ¶¶ 7–9, 18), he remotely ordered products from Coal Harbour while in California, a similar type of sale that Coal Harbour’s website was intended to generate: remote sales generating revenue from California’s large market. Just as the truck in Daimler only needed to be the same type of truck Daimler created a market for in California, Plaintiff’s purchase only needs to be of the same type as those Coal Harbour cultivated. (See Daimler, supra, 80 Cal.App.5th at p. 957.) Further, even if Zandi executed part of his purchase in Canada, it is undisputed that he conducted some communication over the phone and via text message while in California. (Zandi Decl. ¶ 9; Pirooz Decl. ¶¶ 9–11.) Additionally, regardless of where the credit card swipe occurred, Zandi’s ongoing financial injury is experienced in his home, in California, just as the plaintiff in Daimler bore the brunt of his medical expenses—his financial injuries—in California. (See Daimler, supra, 80 Cal.App.5th at p. 957; Zandi Decl. ¶¶ 19–21.) Moreover, even if Pirooz’s claim that no part of the transaction occurred in California is true, Defendants’ refusal to refund Plaintiff occurred while Plaintiff was in California, anchoring his fraud claim here. (Zandi Decl. ¶¶ 18–21.) Given that a lack of relatedness requires circumstances as stark as an Ohioan bringing a suit in California court over events and injuries that occurred entirely in Ohio, (see Ford, supra, 592 U.S. at p. 362 fn. 3), the multiple ways in which Plaintiff’s alleged transaction and injury relate to California must establish relatedness.

Pirooz’s purposeful contacts are as related to this litigation as Coal Harbour’s are. Plaintiff has alleged that Pirooz was personally involved in each phase of the disputed transaction. (Zandi Decl. ¶¶ 7, 9, 19.) Under Evidence Code section 780, the court finds that Pirooz undermined his own credibility by making the glaringly false claim that he and Coal Harbour do no business with California. (Pirooz Decl. ¶ 6.) Given this relative lack of credibility, the court adopts Plaintiff Zandi’s version of the facts here, finding that Pirooz was personally involved in the disputed transaction. The fact that Pirooz was the named addressee of Coal Harbour’s return address supports this view of the facts. Because Pirooz’s purposeful avilment consisted of his administration of e-commerce sales to California, the fact that he did exactly that here is determinative. Plaintiff’s claims are thus also sufficiently related to Pirooz’s purposeful California contacts, so personal jurisdiction over him is appropriate.

3. Jurisdiction is reasonable because all relevant factors favor jurisdiction except for Defendants’ inconvenience, which is not so severe as to violate Due Process.

Considering “the burden on the defendant[;] the interests of the forum State[;] ... the plaintiff's interest in obtaining relief[;] ... the interstate judicial system's interest in obtaining the most efficient resolution of controversies; and the shared interest of the several States in furthering fundamental substantive social policies," the court finds jurisdiction here reasonable. (Snowney, supra, 35 Cal.4th at p. 1070, quotation marks and citations omitted for clarity.) Defendants rely on inconvenience alone, which is not a "compelling" reason to deny the presumption of jurisdiction that exists because Plaintiff has made his requisite showings. (Ibid.)

First, as they claim, the burden on Defendants is significant here. While evidence refutes Defendants' claim that they conduct no business with California, nothing suggests that Defendants have a physical presence here or conduct business in person here. (Pirooz Decl. ¶¶ 2–7.) Consequently, Defendants' appearance in California would not be in the course of their regular business activities. That said, "the same technological progress in communication and transportation that has increased the flow of commerce between the states and the need for jurisdiction over nonresidents, has simultaneously decreased the burdens inherent in defending a lawsuit in a foreign tribunal." (Integral Development, supra, (2002) 99 Cal.App.4th 576, 592 (quotation marks omitted).) Technological progress with respect to remote virtual presence has only accelerated since 2002. Defendants have participated in the case thus far, and they do not appear to have had concrete difficulties litigating in this court, having filed numerous briefs, objections, and a declaration. Evidence shows that Defendants are not denied their day in court, so their inconvenience does not rise to the level of a Due Process violation. Nonetheless, this factor weighs against jurisdiction, even if only weakly.

Second, California has a material interest in ensuring that its citizens enjoy the protections of its own laws, a unique interest that each state has in all its citizens. This factor weighs in favor of jurisdiction.

Third, Plaintiff's recovery is unlikely to depend on the litigation's venue, but California is a much more convenient forum for him. Plaintiff's claims—breach of contract and fraud—are not unique, and nothing on the record indicates a different resolution would be likely in Canada. Further, most of the evidence relevant to this dispute will be digital, so there is no advantage or disadvantage to Plaintiff's ability to recover that California be his venue. Plaintiff, however, is an individual who resides in California. It would be at least as inconvenient for him to appear in Canada as it would be for Defendants to appear in California. This factor also weighs in favor of jurisdiction.

Fourth, there are no issues of interstate efficiency either: California is the only state with any interest in this case, so no other state would make a better or more efficient venue for this litigation. This factor weighs in favor of jurisdiction.

Finally, there are also no apparent substantial social policies that would benefit from this litigation being conducted in Canada, certainly not the social policies of California or any U.S. state. This factor is neutral towards jurisdiction.

On balance, these factors do not make the court's jurisdiction over Defendants unreasonable. Defendants' inconvenience is not sufficient to interfere with Due Process and no other factor weighs against jurisdiction, so Defendants have not met their burden of making a compelling case against jurisdiction's reasonableness.

4. The court does not need to rule on Defendants' objections to the Zandi Declaration or to grant Plaintiff's request for jurisdictional discovery.

The court need not reach the merits of Defendants' objections to paragraphs 15-17 of the Zandi Declaration because none of those paragraphs are material to the prior jurisdictional analysis here.

The court denies Plaintiff's alternative request for jurisdictional discovery because it is moot given the court's finding of jurisdiction on the existing record.

IV. Conclusion

Plaintiff has produced ample evidence at this stage to show that personal jurisdiction exists over Defendants. Defendants ship their products to California, cultivating a Californian market, and this dispute arose out of Defendants' efforts to profit off of that market. There is also no compelling reason that jurisdiction would violate Due Process here. Together, these facts make specific jurisdiction appropriate.
